"Impressions on a Tuesday Evening"

As I was leaving my class from Massie Hall on Thursday and heading for my car, I passed by the Commons Building. A hidden force fell upon me; it was as if someone touched me on the shoulder. I looked up and there she was-- standing so poised and self-assured, answering the reporters' questions. Cameras were flashing as each qualified professional performed his task involved with protecting the "First Lady."

And where was I? I was a spectator--an outside transient--who could only see lips moving without sound. Yet the silence only made the charisma of the moment seem loud and clear. The superb professionalism abounded in both manner and style.

For moments I am so overwhelmed by this flashback of Tuesday's events that I stand entranced on the spot. I remember the afternoon's events of setting up for the crowd, the college personnel's duties, and the reactions from the crowd.

Rosalynn Carter is not what one would call a dynamic speaker; she is soft-spoken and uses each word to her advantage. She gets right to the point. Yet, her dynamic powers are in her style. Her eyes give her thoughts away. When the children from McDermott School sang, her concern was to see their faces, for those voices seemed to capture her heart. She is the kind of person who takes time for handshakes.

As I am looking through the venetian shades of the Commons Building, I see the slat lines playing patterns against the deep maroon of Mrs. Carter's suit.

I am jolted back to reality when I feel the crispness of the evening air and see the neon lights flicker on up and down the street. I am struck by the sadness that falls upon my soul, for I am sorry no longer to be a spectator but a dreamer.
